SMITH, Justice, dissenting.

Appellant Thurman Howard brought this action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act (FELA), 45 USCA § 51 et seq., and the Safety Appliance Act, 45 USCA §§ 2, 5, and 8, to recover for back injuries he sustained in a railroad collision. The case was tried before a jury, which returned a judgment of $565,602.23 in Howard's favor. On appeal, the Court of Appeals reversed. Central of Ga. R. Co. v. Howard, 161 Ga. App. 560 (288 SE2d 347) (1982). It held that the trial court should have granted the railroad's motion for a mistrial because of the introduction of "grossly prejudicial" and irrelevant evidence at trial, as well as "abominably inflammatory" remarks by Howard's counsel.[1]

We granted certiorari to consider "whether the dismissal of Howard by the railroad was relevant to the issues of disputed lost wages and/or future employability." Inasmuch as I believe that the evidence of Howard's dismissal was properly admitted, I respectfully dissent from the denial of appellant's motion for rehearing.

Howard, a locomotive engineer, was injured on July 1, 1978 when, because of a broken coupling, his engine collided with another train. As a result of the accident, Howard experienced lower back pain and was from time to time unable to work. In July of 1980, some two years after the accident, Howard was dismissed by the railroad following an incident in which he got off his engine and fired a .22 rifle at a tree on Union Camp property.[2] He did this while giving his back a rest during a work break. Howard admits that he fired the rifle, but he contends that the railroad used the disciplinary violation as a pretext for firing him. The company's real motive, he contends, was to reduce its liability for lost wages in his pending FELA action. Howard appealed the discharge through administrative channels, and in February of 1980, several days before the trial of this case, he was reinstated as an engineer without back pay.

It is important to remember that at the time of his dismissal, Howard was not able to work because of the injuries he suffered in 1978 while employed by the railroad. At trial, he contended that the sole reason for his dismissal was his previous injury and that the railroad "fired" him in order to escape payment of the approximately $11,000 in wages due him during the period from his firing until the trial. Thus Howard urges that the wrongfulness of his dismissal is not at issue here; rather, he argues, a jury question exists as to the effect of the discharge upon his right to recover damages for lost wages and future employability. Therefore the evidence introduced at trial was relevant to damages issues in the case. I agree, and would hold that evidence touching on these issues was properly admitted at trial.

[1] Based on my review of the record in this case, I think the Court of Appeals erred when it reversed the trial court's denial of the railroad's motion for mistrial. The settled rule in Georgia is that the trial court has broad discretion when passing upon such a motion, and its ruling should not be disturbed absent a manifest abuse of discretion. J. W. Starr &c. Co. v. York, 89 Ga. App. 22 (3) (78 SE2d 429) (1953). I find no such abuse of discretion in this case. Therefore I would reverse the Court of Appeals.

[2] A letter dated July 30, 1980, and addressed to the appellant from his supervisor Cogdell, stated that Howard was ". . . . dismissed from the services of the Central of Georgia Railroad Company, effective immediately." It directed Howard to turn in all company property in his possession. At trial Cogdell testified that, at his level at least, Howard's dismissal was final.

The issues in this case are controlled by federal, not state, law. Questions of damages in FELA actions are federal in nature, even where the action is brought in state court. Norfolk & Western R. Co. v. Liepelt, 444 U. S. 490 (100 SC 755, 62 LE2d 689) (1980). Carriers are liable to their employees under the Act for expenses, loss of time, suffering, and diminished earning power. Michigan Central R. Co. v. Vreeland, 227 U. S. 59 (33 SC 192, 57 LE 417, ...13). In a Georgia case construing the FELA, the court in Pollard v. Gammon, 63 Ga. App. 852, 864 (12 SE2d 624) (1940), held that evidence concerning one's earning capacity after an injury is admissible.

Thus federal law dictates that Howard, when proving his damages at trial, had a right to introduce evidence bearing on the issues of loss of work time and diminished earning capacity after the accident. As to loss of time, there existed a genuine question of fact whether Howard was fired to avoid liability under the FELA for the $11,000 in wages he lost between the dismissal and trial, or whether the dismissal was genuinely motivated by disciplinary reasons so that no back pay was due him. This, it seems to me, is a jury question; and Howard's proffered evidence of past retaliatory discharges by the railroad was highly relevant to that question. As to diminished earning capacity, surely a jury could logically conclude that a dismissal would affect Howard's future employability. If the jury believed that Howard was dismissed by the railroad solely because of his injury, they were authorized to find that the railroad would probably dismiss him again on such basis and that Howard's capacity to work, as an element of his future wages, was greatly diminished. Therefore, the jury could find that Howard would not be able to find work paying as much in salary in the future as he was making before his injury and dismissal.

The evidence on this question was properly admitted. See Moore v. Chesapeake & Ohio R. Co., 493 FSupp. 1252 (D.C. W. Va. 1980).

An independent source of relevancy of Howard's evidence of the railroad's alleged misconduct is found in the FELA itself. 45 USCA § 55 prohibits "[a]ny contract, rule, regulation, or device whatsoever, the purpose or intent of which shall be to enable any common carrier to exempt itself from any liability created by this chapter . . ."

(Emphasis supplied.) Evidence concerning the railroad's dismissal of Howard, together with evidence of alleged past firings of employees who asserted their rights under the FELA, was relevant to a possible violation of this statute. In my opinion, the jury in this case was entitled to have full evidence on the matter to determine whether the railroad used its dismissal powers as a "device" to avoid liability for lost wages in contravention of 45 USCA § 55. Howard's proof on this issue was not directed to any "wrongful discharge" as such, but to a plan, scheme, or "device" by the railroad to deprive him of lost wages.

Because it was relevant to the issue of lost wages, evidence establishing the fact that the railroad had and would dismiss anyone suing them was properly admitted. The Court of Appeals was wrong to hold otherwise. In Hendley v. Central of Ga. R. Co., 609 F2d 1146 (5th Cir. 1980) the Court recognized and dwelled at length on the intimidating effect of the railroad's power against a FELA witness. In the Hendley case, the railroad (the same railroad that is the Appellee here) suspended Hendley for aiding a fellow employee in a FELA claim. Certainly, it was in order for Howard to offer evidence of Hendley's suspension in this case in view of his contention that the railroad dismissed him, not for any rule violation, but simply because he was not working due to an injury sustained while working for the railroad. Howard had missed about half of his working days since the injury in 1978. Under Hendley, Howard had the right to show the actions of the railroad in the past to illustrate what their real intentions were in dismissing him.

The Hendley court stated that if employees can show that the object of a railroad's investigation is to discipline the employee for furnishing information in a FELA case, then injunctive relief by a federal district court is " 'appropriate if not compelled.' " Id. at 1152. If this is so, certainly it is proper to allow a plaintiff in a FELA action to produce evidence tending to prove uncalled-for discipline by an employer, then to allow a jury to pass upon the question.

This Court in criminal cases allows evidence of prior crimes committed by the defendant to show motive, intent, scheme, and bent of mind. I believe that the situation in the case of Howard is analogous.[3] He should be allowed to prove the actions of the railroad in a prior case to illustrate the company's motive, intent, scheme, or bent of mind in its dealings with employees. The Hendley court at page 1152 (10) says as much. Again, this matter of past and future loss of earnings is one that is commonly litigated under the FELA, as well, as in other damages cases. See Dilliplane v. Henderson, 141 Ga. App. 684 (234 SE2d 357) (1947); City Council of Augusta v. Drawdy, 75 Ga. App. 543 (43 SE2d 569) (1947); Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Cunningham, 515 SW2d 678 (1974); Moore v. Chesapeake and Ohio R. Co. 493 FSupp. 1252 (D.C. W. Va. 1980).

[3] 45 USCA § 60 makes it a crime for a common carrier to "prevent employees . . . from furnishing voluntarily information to a person in interest as to the facts incident to the injury or death of any employee . . ." See Hendley v. Central of Ga. R. Co., 609 F2d 1146, 1150 (5th Cir. 1980).

The decision of the Court of Appeals appears to have overlooked these cases in its opinion in Central of Ga. R. Co. v. Howard, 161 Ga. App. 560 (288 SE2d 347) (1982). There was no mention in the opinion of the relevancy of lost wages and future employability.

Appellee railroad argues that even if the evidence of Howard's dismissal was relevant to the damages issues in the case, the evidence was erroneously admitted because Howard's exclusive remedy was to initiate an administrative review procedure under the Railway Labor Act, 45 USCA § 151 et seq. I cannot agree. In my opinion there is ample case authority for allowing Howard to introduce evidence of his dismissal in the present case.

In Alexander v. Gardner-Denver Co., 415 U. S. 36 (94 SC 1011, 39 LE2d 147) (1974), the Court held that an employee asserting a Title VII employment discrimination claim was not bound by a prior arbitration hearing which resulted in a finding adverse to the claimant. The Court stressed that where there exists a federal right independent of the right to an administrative appeal, the employee was entitled to proceed under the independent substantive law. I think that the rationale of Alexander extends to the present case.

Like the plaintiff in Alexander, Howard sought to have his claim for lost wages reviewed in his request for reinstatement under the arbitral provisions of the Railway Labor Act. Since the railway resisted Howard's claim for back wages in the arbitration proceedings, the burden was on Howard during trial of the present case to show that the $11,000 lost wages resulted from his back injury. Howard's claim for back pay is an element of his damages under the FELA, and is separate and distinct from any arbitration remedies he may have. In the Alexander case, the court held that "[t]he distinctly separate nature of these contractual [i.e., in this case, arising under the Railway Labor Act] and statutory [i.e., in this case, arising under the FELA] rights is not vitiated merely because both were violated as a result of the same factual occurrence." 415 U. S. at 50. Howard should be allowed to pursue each and every element of his lost wages claim in this proceeding, unencumbered by the prior administrative proceeding. Furthermore, as the Supreme Court held in Alexander, evidence of the arbitral decision should be "admitted . . . and accorded such weight as the court [here, the jury] deems appropriate." 415 U. S. at 60.

As a practical matter, appellee's argument is that a railroad could use a disciplinary violation as a pretext for discharging an injured employee who could not work because of a FELA injury and that this discharge would effectively cut off all rights to future lost wages as well as the right to be compensated for inability to work and earn a living under the FELA. The appellee would require a discharged employee to appeal to the National Adjustment Board in all cases. However, appellee overlooks the fact that an appeal to an administrative board under the Railway Labor Act in a case such as this one would be futile, as no administrative board would have the power to order a person who could not work reinstated, much less order a railroad to pay back wages to someone who was not in fact able to work. In my opinion, such a position restricting the scope and coverage of the FELA violates the spirit of 45 USCA § 55, which prohibits any "contract, rule, regulation, or device" to defeat "any liability" under the FELA.

The United States Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals has implicitly rejected the railroad's argument in Brotherhood of R. Trainmen v. Central of Ga. R. Co., 305 F2d 605 (5th Cir. 1962); Yawn v. Southern R. Co., 591 F2d 312 (5th Cir. 1979) and Hendley v. Central of Ga. R. Co., 609 F2d 1146, supra, holding in each case that matters arising under Congressional Acts of the United States (including the FELA in Yawn and Hendley) must proceed under such Acts in courts of law and are not subject to administrative action under the Railway Labor Act. The petitioner's claim for lost wages following his injury on July 1, 1978, is a distinct element of damages under this FELA cause of action. In order to prove his lost wages and his loss of ability to work, it was necessary for Howard to place into evidence the circumstances surrounding his discharge and his status at the time of the discharge.

A final matter to be addressed is the portion of the Court of Appeals opinion concerning the argument of appellant's counsel. If, as I contend, Howard's dismissal was relevant to the issue of lost wages and future employability, then remarks of his counsel would be authorized by Seaboard C. L. R. Co. v. Towns, 156 Ga. App. 24 (274 SE2d 74) (1980). "'While counsel should not be permitted in argument to state facts which are not in evidence, it is permissible to draw deductions from the evidence; and the fact that the deductions may be illogical, unreasonable, or even absurd, is a matter for reply by adverse counsel, and not for rebuke by the court.'" Miller v. Coleman, 213 Ga. 125, 130 (97 SE2d 313) (1957). This matter is well settled in Georgia law. Owens v. State, 120 Ga. 209 (47 SE 545) (1904).

In this matter of argument by counsel, the court in Western & A. R. Co. v. York, 128 Ga. 687, 689 (58 SE 183) (1907) said: "We do not think the remarks of counsel were of such character as to require the court to declare a mistrial . . . [i]t is not impassioned oratory which the law condemns and discredits in the advocate, but it is the introduction of facts not disclosed by evidence, which requires the judge to use his power of declaring a mistrial." This Court has been most liberal when reviewing counsel's arguments to the jury. In a recent case, Hines v. State, 249 Ga. 257 (290 SE2d 911) (1982), this court affirmed the trial court's denial of a motion by Hines for a mistrial. The ground for the motion was that the District Attorney in his closing argument stated that the state's witness was "perhaps even putting his life in danger." There was absolutely not one iota of evidence that the state's witness' life was in danger, yet we allowed it to stand. In Howard, the evidence authorized the argument and the Court was present during argument. In my opinion, the trial court is the best judge as to what was prejudicial and was not. We should defer to its judgment absent a manifest abuse of discretion.* There was no such abuse of discretion in this case.

Furthermore, the trial court, in its instructions to the jury, repeatedly admonished that damages due Howard, if any, could be only those suffered "as a result of his injury." Thus it appears that the evidence of the dismissal was strictly limited to its relevance on the issues of lost wages and future employability.

In conclusion, it can be seen that the railroad's denial of lost wages may well have resulted from Howard's back injury, rather than from a disciplinary violation as the railroad contends. The evidence of the discharge therefore was highly relevant and probative on the issues of lost wages and future employability, and was properly admitted by the trial judge. The railroad's "dismissal" of Howard was, I believe, no more than a "device" to cut off compensation and was clearly in contravention of 45 USCA § 55, which prohibits the use of such a "device."

For all of the above reasons, the decision of the Court of Appeals should be reversed and the judgment of the trial court, which was based upon a jury verdict, should be reinstated.

discovery. However, the notice served on appellant clearly indicated that the document examiner was to be deposed as a witness. Therefore, we hold that the requirements of Code Ann. § 81A-126 (b)(4)(B) did not apply and there was no necessity that appellee show exceptional circumstances to authorize the taking of the deposition.

B. Appellant also argues that the admission into evidence of the deposition was error because the deposition was not signed by the witness and appellant did not waive the signing by the witness. Code Ann. § 81A-130 (e) provides that a deposition shall be submitted to the witness for examination and shall be signed by the witness. The only statutory exceptions to the signing requirement are when the witness is ill, or cannot be found, or refuses to sign, or when "the parties by stipulation waive the signing..." Code Ann. § 81A-130 (e). In this case, the certificate of the court reporter recited that signing of the deposition was waived, but it appears on the record that there was no appearance for the defendant. Furthermore, counsel for appellant filed objections to the deposition and expressly denied having waived the signing requirement. Appellant's objections were timely filed and should not have been overruled. It follows that the admission of the deposition into the record was error.

However, we do not find the error to require reversal under the circumstances of this case. Another questioned document examiner testified to the same conclusions reached by the deponent. That testimony was admitted without objection. That being so, the error in admitting the evidence was harmless. Converse v. O'Keefe, 148 Ga. App. 675 (2) (252 SE2d 92).

DECIDED FEBRUARY 23, 1982—
REHEARING DENIED MARCH 10, 1982 — CERT. APPLIED FOR.

Action for rent, etc. Walker Superior Court. Before Judge Painter.

Frank M. Gleason, John W. Davis, Jr., for appellant.

W. Ralph Hill, W. Ben Ballenger, for appellee.

62981. CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RAILROAD COMPANY v. HOWARD.

BIRDSONG, Judge.

Appellant Central of Georgia Railroad Co. (Railroad) appeals a jury verdict awarded to the appellee in this suit. The appellee, a locomotive engineer, allegedly sustained injury when he was thrown from the engineer's seat onto his buttocks on the "catwalk" of the engine when, because of a broken coupling, his train cars collided with other train cars. Appellee's complaint contained the following allegation: "This action is brought under and by virtue of the provisions of the Federal Employers Liability Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 51 et seq., and the Safety Appliance Act, Title 45, U.S.C.A. § 2, § 5, and § 8, and particularly that part that deals with automatic couplers." Held:

1. The Railroad admitted absolute liability in the case under the Safety Appliance Act; therefore, the only issues at trial should have been whether, and to what extent, the accident proximately caused the appellee's alleged injuries. Over repeated and continuing objection by the defense, and with the approval of the trial court, the appellee devoted nearly half of the trial proceedings to the vilification and calumniation of the Railroad corporation and, in particular, of Mr. Codgell, the chief operating officer in charge of railroad operations for Atlanta, Savannah and central Georgia. Part of the stated objective in all this was to show that the Railroad had, on account of the appellee's suit for injury, harassed the appellee by firing him (the evidence shows that some two years after the injury the Railroad fired the appellee for having discharged a .22 rifle on Union Camp property; the appellee left his train and shot bullets into a pine tree in an occupied area of Union Camp property), and hence to claim mental anguish damages based on this alleged harassment and some $11,000 as wages lost before the Railroad reinstated the appellee. In the main however, the appellee with the trial court's approval and over objection, sought to establish the credibility of certain witnesses, also Railroad employees, by showing that they were afraid of Mr. Codgell, who was present in the courtroom, because one of these witnesses (Hendley) had allegedly previously been fired by Mr. Codgell for testifying in favor of another railroad employee in an injury suit against the Railroad.

All of this matter was irrelevant to the issues under trial. The credibility of these witnesses, who were called by the plaintiff Howard as adverse witnesses, was never impeached or impugned by the appellant Railroad in any way. In fact, as appellee's counsel said in closing argument, despite the "pressure these men were under that came in here to testify for Sonny Howard when their supervisor was sitting back there. . .nevertheless they came in and told the truth." None of these witnesses denied that Howard had been injured. The witness Hendley, who had allegedly been fired for testifying in favor of another injured employee, stated under leading questioning of appellee's counsel that he was apprehensive, afraid and nervous about "being in this courtroom [because] a similar situation arose approximately three years ago when I was called to be a witness. I subsequently lost my job over it. [This man (Codgell) sitting here in their chair is the one that fired me. I had to stay out of work sixteen months.]" The "frightened" Hendley then proceeded to give a detailed description of the appellee's back and neck pain, debilitation and deterioration which he had observed. To another witness, who did not testify unfavorably to the appellee, appellee's counsel queried: "I notice that you're a little nervous. The man writing notes back here, grey hair, he's your boss, ain't he? [Objection overruled.] You see all this paper he's got back here and he's been writing on these notes. You see that paper laying in front of him? [Yes.] That's your boss that's writing these notes, is it not? [Yes.] That's Mr. W. D. Codgell. He's the man that signs these letters, 'Arrange to turn in all the company property in your possession. . . .' He's the one that signs these kinds of letters, isn't he? [I don't know, I never received one.] You ain't? [No.] Don't count on not receiving one. You know what he's putting on his list back there? Making a list and checking it twice, getting ready for you? [No, I don't.] But you do know that he had fired folks in the past? [Yes.] And you do know that he's fired people for coming into court and helping other people in [injury] cases, don't you? [Objection: That's inconsistent with the facts, Your Honor]. . . . You do know that they fired Jimmy Hendley. . . . That man right there is the man who done it, wasn't he? [Yes.] But you come in here to tell the truth, didn't you, Mr. Hall? [Yes.] And you're going to do it. . . no matter what he does and no matter what list he's making back here, is that correct?" To the third witness, appellee's counsel asked: "Are you afraid of Mr. Codgell? [No, sir.] You're not? [No.] Well, don't you know that he fired Jimmy Hendley for appearing in a liability case?" Objection was made but counsel for appellee Howard insisted this questioning was necessary to establish the credibility of these witnesses, to show they "have a reason to be afraid . . . and if his answers don't come out just right across the line, that this jury's got a right to know why they're not down the line, that he's concerned about his job . . . [I]n fact even if he tells it just like it happened, the jury can look at this man and know that he came down here under duress of losing his job and told the truth. . . . I want to show why the jury ought to believe him and they ought to believe Mr. Howard." Ultimately, the court permitted counsel to question this witness at length about fear of testifying and being fired.

The evidence allegedly intended to show these witnesses' fear, was not admissible to support these witnesses' veracity, and would not be admissible even if their testimony had conflicted with other evidence offered in support of the appellee. Anderson v. Southern R. Co., 107 Ga. 500, 506 (33 SE 644); Vernon v. State, 49 Ga. App. 187, 191 (174 SE 548). Even if the appellant had attacked the credibility of these witnesses, evidence of their alleged fear of the appellant would not have been admissible because they did not testify favorably to the appellant, and the appellee was not entitled to introduce any evidence in support of their credibility (Anderson, supra; Vernon, supra). The irrelevant evidence was grossly prejudicial to the appellant and, moveover, was presented in such a manner as to exaggerate its prejudice far beyond any merit it might in other circumstances have had. It was error to permit it.

2. The conduct of this trial contained such extensive and grossly improper prejudicial remarks directed at the appellant, that it is impossible for us to say the verdict was not infected with undue bias (Code Ann. § 105-2015). In opening statement, counsel for the appellee stated that because he was fired for discharging a weapon on a customer's property, the appellee "got the idea he was being railroaded" and hired counsel to represent him; that Mr. Codgell was the Railroad's "hatchet man," and "I'll state in my place that if [a] man testifies on behalf of the railroad, he's scared half to death [that he will be fired]." After mild admonition by the trial court, the attorney said: "I apologize for [calling Mr. Codgell] a hatchet. I did not mean that he had . . . a hatchet and went around cutting people with it. I [meant] he's the man that pulls the strings for hiring and firing . . . he is here for the purpose of if one of these witnesses. . . they are afraid. [Objection overruled.] When they sit down up here and say 'I'm a railroad man' and they say, 'Yes, I'm a friend of Sonny Howard,' you keep in mind that their job is on the line because they got the man who controls that particular aspect of their lives. They're going to tell you they're afraid of him. I agree with [counsel for defendant] that [the Railroad does] have a right to a representative [in court]. But . . . Mr. Codgell ain't been at not one of these depositions. He's their man in court and you figure out why he's here . . . What does this $11,084.93 [for lost wages] represent. . . . Well, let me tell you about that. This may be one of them prejudicial things, I don't know. It's something they did, if it's prejudicial, they done it. Last year Sonny Howard was working out here at Union Camp [switching train cars]. Sonny's back was bothering him, so he gets down off the engine . . . went to his car [and took a .22 rifle from the trunk and] shot it a few time to the tree . . . he lost his job. . . . He told them . . . that's what you're doing it to me for because I've been off with my back . . . they were after him . . . that man sitting right there in this courtroom was after him. . ."

The appellee testified that after he was injured Mr. Codgell harassed him by calling an investigation and firing him because of the shooting incident. Appellee's counsel fully explored the alleged firing of Mr. Hendley for helping another employee in an injury case, even referring to a $300,000 settlement paid by the Railroad to settle Mr. Hendley's claims; he asked Mr. Codgell if the Railroad had violated criminal statutes in Mr. Hendley's case, and if he knew Mr. Hendley had a wife and three kids, one of whom was retarded, and whether Mr. Hendley's wife should be proud of Mr. Hendley.

In closing argument, one of appellee's counsel stated that no matter "how big a company is, how much money it's got how . . . powered a lawyer they can hire," the individual has a right to a fair shake; that appellant was "a very wealthy company" and that to the corporation a jury verdict was nothing more than an entry of an "X" in the account books, but Sonny Howard has no ledger to make an entry on; that "apparently [Mr. Codgell's] only participation as far as the trial is concerned was to be here. You know there's a lot of people who have a Sunday School face and a Saturday night mind.... You've heard the expression hard ball? You've never seen a hard ball in your life until you start moving against big companies like this . . . thank the Lord for people like [appellee's lead counsel] who is willing to take them on. He's not going to bow and scrape to them. He's going to represent his people. You now have an opportunity to represent the interest of this individual now...." Appellee's lead counsel then said: "Sonny Howard . . . has faced a lot of persecution and opposition . . . Jimmy Hendley supplied me with the greatest day that I'll ever realize in the law profession. He permitted me to represent him in the most hideous and atrocious action that has ever been brought against any individual in this modern world [and] the reason Jimmy Hendley's situation was brought into this court was to go straight to the credibility of these people that come in here and testified . . . if you don't have anything to lose it's easy to . . . testify. But when somebody has that baseball bat over your head and will knock a knot upside your head that big . . . you can believe what [these] people say that come into court . . . because Mr. Codgell fired him.... Whenever you go any place, even the man that has done you the dirtiest, the low downdest thing that ever happened to you, takes the stand, the best that he can say . . . loyal, honest, good family man, but you fired him, didn't you . . . it tells you something about the quality of a man that would do that . . . I shed tears the day that Fifth Circuit Court . . . said [to the Railroad] you are a law violator, you mistreated the loyal family man. [About the shooting incident], seems like Mr. Codgell and Union [Camp] got something going out there.... [the appellee] felt that he was [fired because of his injury] and you people can conclude that he was.... these letters [of dismissal for firing a gun on customer's property] is as cold blooded as you'll ever read. They don't say, 'Mr. Howard we're giving you fifteen days to think this thing over and be sure you don't do it no more'.... [Mr. Howard admitted he shot the gun] and that was just the honesty that got him [shot] right between the eyes. They just took the .22 rifle and turned it around on him and blew his brains out as hard as they could.... How humiliated would you be? This is the most degrading and loathful thing that can happen to anybody... It wasn't degrading to this southern gentleman [Codgell] ... and it don't make any difference if this railroad has to spend out ten million dollars ... [Mr. Codgell will] still have his job because he is a white collar man.... 'I just shot three folks, I just took three people's jobs away from them, but I'm doing well.' Don't you think [fifteen days suspension] would have been enough with a guy saying, 'I'm sorry, I'm sorry, I'm sorry. Don't whup me, don't whup me no more. Don't hit me no more. I won't do it, I do it no more.'" And on and on.

The arguments of counsel and the injection of irrelevant material were so abominably inflammatory and prejudicial that it is impossible to say the verdict was unaffected thereby. The only issues in this case were whether and to what extent the train accident proximately injured the appellee. Even if the appellee had been wrongly and injuriously fired not because he fired a weapon on the job but because he had lost work time and made personal injury claims against the Railroad, this is clearly not an injury proximately caused by the train accident and is not a matter addressable in this proceeding. It is irrelevant. The remarks and evidence concerning this and Jimmy Hendley's firing and the witnesses' fear of testifying were inadmissible and irrelevant. They served only to engender prejudice against the appellant Railroad as being a powerful wealthy monolith which, with the help of its evil servant Mr. Codgell, continuously browbeats its employees, commits vicious criminal acts against the ordinary working man and does the "dirtiest, the low-downdest" things to the loyal family man. Appellee's counsel even strongly suggested to the jury that this case was their chance to stand up to the Railroad and punish its villainy. The language and irrelevant evidence used "was so calculated to prejudice the jury against [the] railroad [company], that it is extremely doubtful if its injurious effects could have been cured by any rebuke of the court or by any instructions to the jury. A mistrial was the only remedy." Southern R. Co. v. Gentle, 36 Ga. App. 11, 13 (135 SE 105). The case is reversed. See esp. Georgia Power Co. v. Puckett, 181 Ga. 386 (182 SE 384); Western &c. R. Co. v. Cox, 115 Ga. 715, 717 (42 SE 74).

63068. SOLOMON v. THE STATE.

SHULMAN, Presiding Judge.

Appellant attacks the sufficiency of the evidence presented against him in his trial for burglary of the Perry School Annex, a building occupied by the Houston County Board of Education. Finding the evidence sufficient to support this conviction, we affirm.

Police officers discovered appellant crouched behind one of the school's air conditioning units. Contrary to appellant's assertion, this is not a case where appellant was convicted solely on evidence of his presence at the scene of a crime (compare Sweat v. State, 119 Ga. App. 646 (168 SE2d 654)), since another suspect, captured as he fled the school building, testified for the state at appellant's trial and identified appellant as a member of the quartet which broke into the school building. Under Code Ann. § 38-121, the testimony of one witness is generally sufficient to establish a fact except in a felony case where the witness is an accomplice. In such a case, there must be independent corroborative evidence which tends to connect the accused with the crime. Adams v. State, 140 Ga. App. 621 (231 SE2d 547). Appellant's timely presence at the scene of the crime and the circumstances of his discovery there are sufficient corroboration of the accomplice's testimony and, taking the evidence as a whole, we conclude that a rational trier of fact could have found appellant guilty of burglary beyond a reasonable doubt. Jackson v. Virginia, 443 U.S. 307 (99 SC 2781, 61 LE2d 560).

Judgment affirmed. Birdsong and Sognier, JJ., concur.

NOTICE OF PETITION FOR CERTIORARI TO SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

Notice is hereby given that Thurman H. Howard, Petitioner in the above-stated case, hereby petitions to the Supreme Court of the United States from the judgment of the Supreme Court of Georgia, as revised and entered July 22, 1982, and in which Petitioner's Motion for Rehearing was denied by the Supreme Court of Georgia on July 22, 1982. This Notice shall form a part of Thurman H. Howard's petition for the writ of certiorari to the Supreme Court of the United States to review the said judgment of the Supreme Court of Georgia and the judgment of the Court of Appeals of Georgia.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Georgia was a final judgment vacating certiorari review of the judgment of the Georgia Court of Appeals and which reversed a jury verdict and judgment in favor of Thurman H. Howard ordering and adjudging that Thurman H. Howard recover of Central of Georgia Railroad Company the sum of Five Hundred Sixty Five Thousand Six Hundred Two Dollars and 23/100 ($565.602.23) with interest thereon at the legal rate and his costs of the action.

The Clerk of the Court of Appeals of Georgia, which Court is possessed of the record, will omit nothing from the record on appeal in that Court, including the transcript of evidence and proceedings filed for inclusion in the record on appeal, and said Clerk of the Court of Appeals of Georgia is requested to certify said record and provide for its transmission to and filing with the Clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The Supreme Court of the United States has jurisidiction over this matter under 28 U.S.C.A., §1257(3).
